

Dear family and loved ones,

Talanga, Honduras is where we will spend next Thursday and Friday nights holding at least two seminars and appear on their radio station before traveling several hours south to Choluteca (500,000 population) to repeat the above.

This small farming community is exactly the type of area where historically almost all revivals have started. Please pray that HE will be glorified by what occurs in Talanga and that He will hear our prayer that revival will come to Latin America.

We can imagine what Talangas Hotel Afuente will be like but we can also imagine the receptiveness of the message by Christians that are not caught up in the things of the world.

Charles and Judy

Talanga from Wikipedia

Road in Talanga

Talanga Talanga is a municipality in the Honduran department of Francisco Morazán. It lies on the highway connecting Tegucigalpa with the department of Olancho. Talanga is a medium-sized municipality relying heavily on agriculture. It's most important crops include corn, sugar cane and livestock fodder.

MooreReport.com Newsletter

June 7, 2008

Perhaps the most notable feature of Talanga is that the streets are all dirt.

In most towns of its size in Honduras, the primary streets are paved. The town is just finishing installing a sewer system (as of 2006) and paving is an upcoming project. For now, the town is the epitome of "wild, wild west," with ox carts, cowboys on horseback, stray dogs, untended livestock, and minimal law enforcement. Talanga has a very good indoor market with produce, meat, pots and pans, and other household goods.

There are about seven well-stocked hardware stores, as well as two internet cafes. The town square was recently built with concrete fixtures and a basketball court. There is a hill with a cross near the town center with an excellent view of the town and surrounding area.

The people of Talanga are very friendly and one would be hardpressed to walk the main street without having people say "buenas" and starting conversations.

Please pray that revival will begin in this area.